TEACHING EXPERIENCE:

Instructor, Department of Sociology, KU Leuven

S0J95A “Culture, Identity, and Alterity” (Fall 2022)

Course description: How do we come to know who and what we are? What are the social preconditions—cognitive, linguistic, institutional, and ethical—for identity? What are the implications of living in a world where plural, overlapping, and conflicting identities co-exist in close proximity (real or virtual) to one another? And what do we make of the fact that those identities exist not in perfect equality, but rather within and across hierarchical and stratified social orders? In this course, we will examine classical and contemporary sociological responses to these questions. More specifically, this course will cover how sociologists have theorized the social and cultural construction of identity, thereby introducing students to sociological perspectives on individuality, community, solidarity, authority, alterity, exclusion, and stigma.

SOC 95a “Postmodernization: Science Under Siege” (Winter 2021) (co-instructor with Dick Houtman)

Course description: Max Weber famously diagnosed the modernity world as disenchanting; for him, modernity as an epoch was defined by the rise of rationality and scientific expertise. Yet, in the last decade we have seen the spread of conspiracy theories on social media, widespread skepticism scientific authority and institutions, and the flowering of “fake news.” What explains these developments? In this course, we will use the tools of cultural sociology—which foregrounds the role of meaning and morality in the constitution of modern social life—in order to make sense of our present “post-truth” moment. We will think of science, less as a method by which to attain practical knowledge about the empirical world, and more as a meaning-system that requires moral norms, compelling narratives, social institutions, and carrier groups for its survival and reproduction. And in the process, we will critically interrogate how sociologists have theorized “modernity,” beginning with Weber’s disenchantment thesis.

Instructor, Department of Philosophy, Queen’s University

PHIL 204 “Life, Death, and Meaning” (Fall 2019)

Course description: Many people wish to live a meaningful life. But what exactly does this mean? Is it even coherent to speak of a life as being full (or void) of meaning? And if it is, does meaning rest in the eye of the beholder or is it open to objective evaluation? Furthermore, are there necessary conditions (e.g. social, cultural or economic) to give a life meaning? And how might the fact of human mortality shape our thinking on the subject? In this course we will consider a variety of philosophical texts, ancient and contemporary, to help us think through these and other relevant questions. We will also borrow insights offered by the social sciences. Our aim will be to grapple with the question of meaning in life, both in the abstract and as it relates to our everyday experience.
